

Everything started with the news that there was going to be a students' mobility as part of the Comenius Project in the educational establishment that I, one of the lucky four, attend or, to be more specific, have attended for two years already.

The said news stated we were going to Greece, the cradle of European civilization and the bringer of democracy, or its principles. It surely is a fact that I was, for a lack of better choice of words, dying to go (as was every participant and every non-participant in this wonderful project).

The amount of time we were together was limited, but it was enough to create wonderful friendships with people that were, and are, kind, friendly and awesome to make it a wonderful experience.

Our hosts, be it the ones that provided us with home and food were very kind, as well as other students who decided to give us company on the excursions and every kind of activity planned and unplanned. Some people will be very dear to me and I'll always remember them, even though I've been with them only a few days.

This trip was, in my opinion, the best kind of experiment and experience to allow us to interact with different cultures, peoples and ways of thinking.

It was a form of self -progress, an assistance of developing further socialization and language skills, a way to widen our mentalities and be more open to a new world and new minds.

As a final word, I would like to thank everyone who made this opportunity come through and become a reality.
